

Acknowledgement

The author would like to thank Anette Hoffmann, Kevin Malseed and Sébastien Rebaud for their assistance in the translation of the questionnaires and responses. Appreciation is extended to Debbie Chantal Gray and Elizabeth Johanna Brezovich for their research assistance and to colleagues at UNESCO for their critical reading of the drafts and constructive comments. The report has benefited from the valuable linguistic and semantic combings by Rosalind Melis and also Beatrix van der Schalk.

*'Any thought, any idea, any theory, is simply a way of seeing, a way of viewing an object from a particular vantage point.
It may be useful,
but that usefulness is dependent upon particular circumstances – the time, the place, the conditions to which it is applied.
If our thoughts are taken to be final, to include all possibilities, to be exact representations of reality, then eventually we run up against conditions where they become irrelevant.
If we hold on to them in spite of their irrelevance, we are forced either to ignore the facts or to apply some sort of force to make them fit.
In either case,
fragmentation is the result'.*
